

Fiber optic cable 300

AI Overview

A 300-foot fiber optic cable is available in multiple types, including single-mode and multimode, pre-terminated assemblies, and bulk spools for indoor or outdoor applications.

Types and Specifications

Single-Mode Fiber (OS2/G.657.A2): Designed for long-distance transmission with minimal signal loss. Examples include the Ubiquiti FC-SM-300, which is outdoor-rated, features Kevlar yarn for tensile strength, and comes with LC connectors for tower or outdoor network deployments. Corning's CLR-HALLM-300-12F-MTPM-0W is a 12-fiber single-mode indoor assembly with MTP to pigtail connectors, suitable for horizontal interconnects.

Multimode Fiber (OM3/OM4/OM4+): Optimized for high-speed data over shorter distances, commonly used in data centers. Pre-terminated 300 ft assemblies from Panduit offer 12 or 24 fibers with OFNP plenum-rated jackets, MPO or PanMPO connectors, and standard polarity for easy deployment. Bulk multimode spools (50/125 μm) are available for custom installations, allowing users to terminate connectors as needed.

HDMI Fiber Optic Cables: For AV applications, the OREI 300ft Fiber Optic HDMI 2.0 cable supports 4K@60Hz, HDR, and 18Gbps uncompressed bandwidth. It uses a hybrid copper and optical fiber design to ensure zero signal loss over long distances, ideal for home theaters or professional AV setups.

Key Features

Indoor/Outdoor Use: Many cables are rated for plenum, riser, or outdoor environments. Outdoor cables often include weatherproof jackets, ripcords, and Kevlar reinforcement for tensile strength.

Connector Options: LC, MPO, PanMPO, or pigtail terminations are common. Pre-terminated assemblies save installation time, while bulk spools allow custom termination.

Durability: Armored or reinforced jackets protect against crushing, bending, and environmental exposure. Minimum bend radius and tensile strength specifications ensure reliable performance.

Applications: Suitable for networking, telecommunications, CCTV, data centers, AV transmission, and long-distance fiber li...
