

List of North Korean Gigabit Optical Module Suppliers

AI Overview

There is currently no publicly available information confirming the existence of a North Korean manufacturer of gigabit industrial optical modules. North Korea's technology and telecommunications sector is highly restricted and largely isolated from international markets, making it difficult to verify the presence of companies producing advanced optical networking equipment such as SFP, XFP, or QSFP transceivers. Most known optical module manufacturers are based in South Korea, Taiwan, China, and other countries, including:

- OptiCore (South Korea): Specializes in optical transceivers and WDM devices for wireless fronthaul, backhaul, and data center applications.
- Opticis (South Korea): Produces fiber-optic digital links for high-definition video, medical imaging, and industrial applications.
- Taihan Fiberoptics (South Korea): Develops optical materials and fiber-optic cables for communication networks.
- HuiGoo Optic (China): Manufactures a wide range of optical transceivers and WDM components for global markets.
- Network Cable (South Korea): Focuses on passive optical network components.

Due to North Korea's limited export and industrial transparency, any domestic production of gigabit optical modules is likely restricted to internal use and not publicly documented. Companies in North Korea may produce basic fiber-optic components for government or military networks, but there is no verified commercial manufacturer supplying international markets. For industrial or commercial optical modules, it is recommended to consider South Korean, Chinese, or Taiwanese suppliers, which provide certified gigabit optical transceivers and modules with global support and warranties.
