

What are some German optical module companies

AI Overview

Germany hosts several leading companies producing optical modules for industrial, medical, and research applications, including INGENERIC, DoroTEK GmbH, and ZEISS. Key Companies INGENERIC develops and manufactures optical components and modules for high-power applications, research, medical technology, and industrial measurement. Their product range includes collimation modules, beam transformation optics, micro-lens arrays, aspheres, spheres, and freeform optics. They provide the full process chain from lens and system design to prototyping and mass production, making them a leading provider of beam transformation optics for semiconductor lasers and optical data communications. DoroTEK GmbH (part of the Solaris Group) specializes in optical components and laser modulators, including thin-film technology, infrared detectors (2–13 μm spectral range), and laser engraving services. Their expertise covers both custom optical components and industrial-scale production. ZEISS is a globally recognized technology company in optics and optoelectronics. They produce optical modules for ophthalmic solutions, scientific instruments, and semiconductor manufacturing. ZEISS also develops advanced optical inserts for devices like Apple Vision Pro, demonstrating their innovation in high-precision optical systems. TRIOPTICS focuses on optical measurement and manufacturing systems, including the OptiSpheric® line for testing lenses and optical systems. They provide solutions for quality control and development of optical modules. Leica Microsystems manufactures microscopes and custom optical components for scientific and industrial applications, offering high-precision optical modules for specialized uses. Sill Optics produces customized optical lenses and photonic technologies, serving applications in eyewear, instruments, and industrial...
